Proposed federal smoking ban just so much smoke-blowing

So just what's the deal with smoking?

The issue, which has gotten a lot of press in recent months, is getting even more now that a federal ban on workplace smoking is being considered.

The whole thing has made me more than a little baffled.

I smoke - but I wouldn't recommend it to anyone else. It's an expensive, filthy habit, one I know I'd be better off without.

But like many other women my age, I started smoking to appear "cool".

I didn't know my desire to be cool would end up making me wheeze and cough 20 years later.

Having said all that, I still don't understand the hullabaloo at the federal level about smoking.

Surgeon general Joycelyn Elders - who thinks it would be a good idea to look at legalizing drugs - thinks cigarettes should be banned.

I suppose there might be some convoluted logic in there, but it escapes me.

Then, too, President Clinton wants to use increased cigarette taxes to pay for his health care plan.

But he's doing everything in his power to make it difficult to smoke.

So, if people quit, who's going to pay for the health care plan?

Then, too, if he's really serious about eliminating smoking, why hasn't he done away with the federal subsidy to tobacco growers?

Like I said, smoking is a nasty habit, but it's a powerful addiction - kind of like drinking.

And we all know how successful Prohibition was.

The push to ban smoking isn't just at the federal level. It's everywhere.

Restaurants, including the local McDonald's, have become smoke-free, which I suppose is well and good if you want to eat and leave in a hurry.

For those of us who dawdle over an after-dinner cigarette, it's a pain in the butt.

Furthermore, in a totally unscientific study, I've found that at one local eatery, the Hoopeston Family Restaurant, the smoking section is usually packed while the non-smoking section is empty.

What's that tell you?

It's getting to the point where those of us who smoke will have to keep our clouds of blue smoke behind closed doors.

The problem is a two-fold one. First, all these do-gooders who want to ban smoking are infringing on our right. It comes under the "pursuit of happiness" heading.

Second, smokers are a large but very unorganized group of mild-mannered people.

Unless we organize, we're going to end up with places similar to the speakeasy of Prohibition - dark basement rooms with REALLY thick clouds of smoke. We'll talk in whispers and every time there's a knock at the door, we'll wonder if it's Elliott Ness ready to bust us.

That's what's going to happen if we don't act. If you're a smoker or a non-smoker who sees this as an erosion of everyone's rights, drop me a line. Maybe we can do something.
