Beating the heat

Cool shade, cold fluids needed during hot days

It's hot.

With temperatures in the mid 90s, the least bit of work is tiring, perspiring, and potentially dangerous.

Summer heat can pose health problems for small children, the elderly and those with breathing problems, according to Julie Mullen, nurse manager, acute care service, at Hoopeston Community Memorial Hospital.

Add high humidity levels to high temperatures and everybody suffers.

There are ways to beat the heat and keep safe from heat stroke.

First, whether working outdoors, or indoors without air conditioning, it is important to take frequent breaks to cool off, Mullen said.

Second, she said, those in hot situations should drink plenty of fluids, especially water.

Medical experts recommend eight to 10 eight-ounce glasses of water daily "and that's not even on a hot day," Mullen said.

Fluid intake is especially important for those who are active in the heat, like children who play outside. "They really need to drink a lot of water," she said.

Some beverages, such as tea and coffee, are not recommended because they are natural diuretics, helping the body expel water. "You do enough of that in the summer through sweating," Mullen said.

Another beverage often sought on hot days is also not recommended. "Beer is a no-no," Mullen said, because it, too, is a diuretic.

For those who don't like water, Mullen recommended flavoring it with a dash of lemon, or purchasing over-the-counter sports drinks, which replace electrolytes lost through perspiration.

Electrolytes are chemicals which keep the body's cells regulated.

Those who are in the sun should protect themselves from ultra-violet rays. "Always wear a sun-block," Mullen said.

To lessen the affect of the heat, Mullen sug-

Letter to the Editor

Dear Editor:

In a recent Just the Facts, you had an article on the curfew for the youth of this town. The police department said it was going to enforce this law and both parents and children would be held responsible.

Well, I have yet to see this be put in effect.

Kids are still running the streets all hours of the night. Also, the recent rash of burglaries and break-ins appear to be youth-related by the description of the items taken and the vandalism done.

I'm not laying the blame for this on any one group. I'm sure the police department is trying to get this under control, but they need the help of parents to make it effective.

I recently moved here from a metropolitan area because of the gang problem and I can tell you that if Hoopeston does not get a handle on this problem now, we are in for some big trouble.

I don't know how most parents in this town feel, but I would be grateful the curfew was enforced and kids held responsible for their actions by involving them in community work and any other kind of work the city could have them do.

It's time parents took control of children. After all, this is the future of our country and I, for one, am a little skeptical that the youth we have growing up now can be responsible enough to handle that future.

Mullen had two other suggestions for beating the heat. "If people have the opportunity to use a swimming pool, that's great," she said. "And I don't see anything wrong with encouraging people who don't have air conditioning to visit the local mall."
