Better planning does not an anniversary event make

Life just isn't fair!

Twenty-five years ago. I wanted to attend the original Woodstock. Three days of love, peace and loud music sounded good to me.

Unfortunately, I was only 12, and my mother, who has no sense of humor, decided Bethel, New York was no place for a 12-year-old to be all alone.

It's now 25 years later - time for Woodstock '94. I didn't make this one, either, but not because Mom wouldn't let me.

This time, the whole thing seemed pointless.

The original Woodstock fit the times. Rock music was just beginning to hit its stride, peace and love would conquer all and young people could show their elders a better way.

Or at least that's what we thought.

Woodstock seemed to mean something.

Which is more than you can say for the anniversary celebration, which started Friday in Saugerties, N.Y.

First, the music has changed. The original event featured music of the times. It would seem only fitting that an event marking the 25th anniversary would do the same.

But there few 60s-era bands were scheduled to perform. Instead, groups with names like Nine Inch Nails and Roguish Armament were expected to play.

Then there was the crowd. I thought a Woodstock anniversary would be done around the idea of attracting the same people who attended the original. (although the idea of a 40-plus investment banker in tie-dyed shirt and love beads seems ludicrous) but that seems not to be the case.

Media reports indicate the crowd to be predominantly twenty-something, much like the original.

If this shindig was held for the children of those who originally attended, it should've been called something else, something more befitting the younger generation.

By LOURDINE OSBORNE

Then there is the consumer awareness surrounding the anniversary event that was absent the first time around.

Part of the legend of the original event was that nothing was planned properly for the number of people who attended. Parking was a problem. There weren't enough bathrooms. Food vendors couldn't feed the multitude.

And despite all that - or maybe because of it - the event was a success.

The '94 model had none of that. It was clean, sanitary, organized.

Promoters of Woodstock '94 were very aware of the merchandising and advertising needed to pull this thing off. The hype that preceded the concert was phenomenal.

Back in 1969, promoters were more naive. While the original concert was promoted, it seemed more like a get-together than a planned concert. There were no t-shirts, souvenir shacks or buttons.

When the influx of people became too great, they were allowed in free. You can bet that didn't happen this year.

Concert-goers were less sophisticated then, too. Crowds didn't mind waiting several hours to hear music on a bad sound system, something attendees at this year's event did not have to tolerate.

Tickets were a lot cheaper in 1969 than the $135 asking price in 1994.

Comparing the two, the 1994 version probably was the more pleasant. There was less waiting, more food, better sound, fewer hassles.

But it lacked one thing the '69 concert had: spirit.

I'm still not happy with Mom about making me miss the original.

I guess all I can hope for is that there will be a 50th anniversary celebration. Then all of us who wished we could go to the 1969 concert could cash our Social Security checks, don our tie-dyed shirts and support hose and have a great time.
