Squeezing a civics lesson from the OJ Simpson case

Jury selection is expected to begin today in what is being hailed as "the trial of the century": the OJ Simpson case.

And while the trial is not expected to begin until November, perhaps now is a good time for a civics lesson based on what has occurred thus far.

Let's see. First, we've learned that your defense is as good as the amount of money you have to spend.

If you're an internationally-known defendant with beaucoup bucks, you get high priced defense attorneys who, in turn, request all kinds of high priced tests to prove your innocence.

In fact, if you're an internationally-known defendant, you can skip out and cruise the highways of California while specatators wave signs urging you on.

If you're a poor person and you skip out to cruise the highways of California, you'd probably get shot for fleeing and eluding. And you might as well forget the high priced tests.

If you're an internationally-known defendant, there's a reasonable explanation why small amounts of your blood were found at the scene of the crime. And that explanation has zippo to do with the fact that you committed the crime.

If you're a poor person whose blood was found at the scene, you did it, plain and simple. No need for those fancy schmancy DNA tests then.

If you're an internationally-known defendant, the fact that you're depressed is cause for a suicide watch while you lounge in a cell all to yourself.

If you're poor and depressed, you not only don't get a private cell, but your roomie is a big guy named Buck who tells you how pretty you look.

If you're an internationally-known defendant, hundreds of articles will be given over to covering your life, from the moment of conception on. You'll get more magazine covers than you ever dreamed possible.

If you're not an internationally-known defendant, the local paper will cover your trial.

If you're the now-dead wife of an internationally-known defendant, spousal abuse becomes something of a cause celebre.

If you're a poor woman who's getting the stuffing knocked out of her, well, too bad.

Some have tried to make the Simpson case one of color, saying that he was arrested primarily because he was black.

In this civics lesson, I'd have to agree that color has something to do with things, but not skin color.

In the legal system, it doesn't matter if you're black or white, as long as you have lots of green.
