Mother's Day gives time to remember words to live by

With Mother's Day right around the corner, it is time once again for us to reflect on the women who brought us into this world, who loved and nurtured us.

Moms do a lot of things. They wake up every two hours to feed us when we're infants. They walk the floor with us when we're colicky. They send us off on our first day of school and don't move away while we're gone.

But perhaps the most important thing moms do is pass on sayings that become so imbedded in our subconscious, we find ourselves repeating them when we become parents.

These gems of wisdom are Momilies. Here are a select few:

Quit playing with that or you'll poke your eye out!

No matter what game children are playing, moms universally apply this one. Small Barbie hands become dangerous weapons in the hands of rambunctious children. And if you happen to be sword-fighting with sticks, well, so much the better.

It has not been proven that any child, anywhere, anytime has ever turned into optic shish-kebob, but it sounds good.

I suppose if everyone else were jumping off a tall building, you'd want to jump, too.

This is usually uttered after the child has asked to stay out all night with members of the opposite sex because "everybody else is gonna."

I'll give you something to cry for.

This, uttered in a threatening tone, is delivered to a wailing child.

Obviously, said mother has not noticed that the child already has something to cry for, or the child would not be crying.

Just wait til your father gets home.

I understand this one gets a lot of use, although we did not hear it ever at our house. To my friends who'd erred, father coming home was a dreadful thought. Things were different at our house. Not only would we "get it" from our mother, if the situation were bad enough. Dad would join the fun.

I brought you into this world and I can take you out.

This particular Momily, usually uttered through very clenched teeth, is a personal favorite because it shows all the love and warmth a mother has for her children. Don't you think?

Because I said so, that's why.

(Alternate version: because I'm the mom.)

This is usually the final statement in what has been an on-going discussion between mother and child.

The neat thing about Momilies is that, often, you get the whole list in one conversation

Child: Why can't I pierce my cheek?

Mom: Because you'll poke your eye out.

Child: But everyone else is doing it.

Mom: I suppose if everyone else were jumping off a tall building, you'd want to jump, too.

Child (crying): But it's my cheek!

Mom: If you don't stop right now, I'll give you something to cry for!

Child: But if I don't get to pierce my cheek, I'll just die!

Mom: You thinking about dying? I brought you into this world and I can take you out!

Child: I hate you!

Mom: Just wait til your father gets home!

Child: But why can't I pierce my cheek.

Mom: Because I said so, that's why.

Is it any wonder, come Sunday, we'll be honoring our moms?
