Smile! You're on camera in Hoopeston police vehicles

Hoopeston Police Chief Mark Drollinger clips a microphone to his uniform shirt and adjusts the video camera. He's not getting ready to make a public service announcement. Instead, he's getting ready to patrol the streets of Hoopeston.

Two of the police department's four cars were recently fitted with video equipment, including a camera, video cassette recorder and microphone. Officers using one marked car or the unmarked white car wear wireless microphones and can adjust the cameras for a wide image or zoom in for detailed close-ups. Video tapes, which will record eight hours of activity, are stored in a fireproof safe in the trunk of each vehicle "to preserve the chain of evidence," Drollinger said.

The taping equipment will be used in several ways. First, all traffic stops will be taped, allowing officers to videotape field sobriety tests. Also, investigators may record interviews conducted outside the squad cars. The cameras may also be used for surveillance. The recorder stamps the date and time of each session on the tape, allowing them to be used as evidence. Tapes not needed for court proceedings will be erased and reused.

Videotaping activity is a way of protecting both officers and suspects. "It keeps the good guys and the bad guys honest," Drollinger said, adding that recently, an officer in another city was shot by a suspect but because the car was equipped with a camera, the shooter was caught.

Using the equipment will not violate suspects' rights because courts have ruled that traffic stops are exempt from the eavesdropping law and there are currently no laws against videotaping in public places, Drollinger said.

The equipment was purchased from Custom Signals in Chanute, KS., one of 10 companies investigated before the products were ordered. Drollinger considered removable cameras but decided on mounted units because fewer problems were reported.
Most of the funds for the video equipment came from a federal grant. Ten percent, about $700, was city money but those funds will be recouped through a state DUI enforcement program, Drollinger said.
