 percent met reading standards. At Honeywell, of 102 third graders tested, 45 percent met and 16 percent exceeded reading standards; 53 percent met writing standards and 54 percent met and 28 percent exceeded math goals.
 The only category in which the district did not meet standards was in a subgroup of reading and math for special education students, Conolly said.
 In unrelated discussion, Conolly said vocational education classes may be offered at the Rossville-Alvin High School building when the school deactivates next year.
 Representatives of Danville Area Community College, Hoopeston Area, Rossville-Alvin, Bismarck-Henning and Armstrong-Potomac have tentatively agreed on vocational classes to be offered through DACC for the 2005-06 year.
 The tentative list includes agriculture and child development, currently offered at Rossville-Alvin, along with foods, consumer service management, graphic design, health occupations, criminal justice, horticulture, fire prevention and welding.

 cation in the county, will be scaled back to two programs next year. "DACC has graciously offered to fill in the gap," Conolly said.
 The dual enrollment courses - providing both high school and college credit - will be offered at half the tuition rate. Twelve to 13 students are needed for each of the classes to be offered, he said.
 Officials from the schools must still coordinate times since the districts have differing lengths for class time.
 The board also:
 approved extending the breakfast program to the middle and high schools. Breakfast, including foods such as cold cereal, toaster pastries and granola bars, is currently offered at Maple, Honeywell and John Greer.
