Childhood dream leads to postmaster's position for woman

After serving under three postmasters - and filling in for them when necessary - Julie McCrory now claims the title as her own.

After applying for the position after Connie Drake moved to the Cissna Park post office on December 11, McCrory was one of three candidates who traveled to Kankakee to be interviewed. After a two and half hour interview, she was notified on May 29 that she had the job, which became effective June 8.

For now, the 54-year-old is doing double duty, overseeing post offices and employees in Hooperston, Wellington and East Lynn, while also doing some clerking, the job she's done since she was hired under retired postmaster Paul Zierninsky.

He and others saw traits in her and guided her to her new position. "Even way back when, Paul had me doing things," she said. "Since I walked in the door, they've been grooming me for it." Three times over her career, she has served as officer in charge when the postmaster was away.

McCrory's career path started in her childhood. Watching mail carriers, "I thought it looked neat and I thought, 'Maybe I'd do that.'"

Fast forward to the early 1990s, a friend said post office was hiring and brought her an application. She traveled to Bridgeport for what she called a "cattle call" testing. She passed, only to learn the postal service implemented a five-year hiring freeze. But fate was on her side. "I got in just in time before they purged the list" of potential employees.

A self-described people person, McCrory also says she's a problem solver, whether that problem is what size box is needed to mail a package - "I can look at a bag in their hand and know what size box they need." That skill came in handy for the most unusual thing someone wanted to mail: a tanned deer hide. "I figured it out. I'm the one who helped him pack it up."

There are more complicated tasks, like staffing the Hooperston office, currently down two clerks: her former position, which could only be opened to applications after she was named postmaster, and the one left when Nancy Voyles retired in June. "I call it Problem Solving 101," she said. "Generally, anything can be fixed."

To fix the manpower shortage, McCrory brought in two women, Angelina Savage who works at the Wellington post office and Chris Bury from the Milford office.

McCrory is also part of the solution, working more hours herself. Postmaster is supposed to be a 9-5, weekday job, but she is working 6-6 and weekends. An Amazon truck pulls in at 6 a.m. to drop off the day's packages and the last truck of the day leaves at about 5:40 p.m.

Still, it could be worse. McCrory remembers days before all the mail was sent to a sorting center - currently Champaign - and delivered back sorted by route. In those days, it was all hands on deck at 4:45 a.m. to sort the mail for the day's routes.

There is "light at the end of the tunnel," with news of permanent clerks coming "soon." Asked if soon means as a gift for her September birthday, she replied "maybe."

With 20 years, McCrory could retire in a couple of years, but is looking at staying for 10 or 12 more. But she already has a retirement plan. When her grandchildren are grown, she dreams of selling her home, buying a motorhome and travelling. There's family to visit in California. Florida strikes her fancy, too. "I don't know how my (ancestors) ended up here. I don't like the cold."
