Soil health/STAR workshop set Tuesday for area farmers

A Soil Health and STAR (Saving Tomorrow's Agriculture Resources) workshop will be held Tuesday, Feb. 25, at the USDA Service Center, 1905 U.S. Route 150, Danville. It is co-sponsored by the Vermilion County Soil & Water Conservation District and the Nature Conservancy.

The S.T.A.R program has recently been endorsed by the National Association of Conservation Districts as a universal tool for all producers across the country to complete a field form that is scored by a local reviewer.

Points are assigned for everything from cover crops, fertilizer used for nutrient management at different points during the year, to various possible conservation practices used on that field to prevent runoff into nearby water sources.

This self evaluation tool is for personal use only as the information is not shared. A farmer receives a sign for his field that is ranked on a 5-star scale to identify their S.T.A.R designation.

The program touts several key benefits for decreasing nutrient loss in the soil and encouraging other farmers to help meet the state's nutrient loss reduction goals, increasing net farm income, possible new markets to sell crops grown using conservation practices and supporting the ongoing work of soil & water conservation districts to preserve and promote the state's natural resources.

Following the workshop, a free lunch will be held during the networking time.

Please RSVP by Monday, Feb. 24 to (217) 442-8511, ext 3.
